It's made a big difference and is getting increasingly popular, especially as large screen TVs continue to get more affordable. With such a massive leap in screen size, however, the question still stands: is it really worth it? Should you buy a 4K TV if you're a fairly average movie-goer who enjoys playing games and surfing the net on your device? While many pundits will argue the merit of buying 4K TV, it is actually not that hard to find the best 4K TV deals for under $500. With a more extensive screen space, you won't miss out on important details. In many ways, you're also buying your 4K TV in order to access it. Compared to other TVs, you'll be enjoying a larger screen, but, as these big screens increase in price, so does the number of cords required to connect it to your device. Before you spend more than $500, consider how many connections you need. You'll be hooking up something to a power source and at least a camera. In a worst-case scenario, you'll find yourself with multiple signals all connected at the same
